

DOCTOR OF PHILOSOPHY IN COMMUNICATION SCIENCES AND DISORDERS

Application Requirements

- Online application
- $50 application fee
- Goals statement (upload with the application) must indicate research interest and future career plans
- Resume (upload with the application)
- Graduate degree in communication sciences and disorders
- Official transcripts

Application Deadlines

- Fall: Dec. 1

To apply, please visit:

education.gsu.edu/admissions/graduate

For more information:

education.gsu.edu/csd

Jacqueline Laures-Gore: jlaures@gsu.edu

Maryann Ronski: mromski@gsu.edu

Program Overview

The focus of the Ph.D. program in communication sciences and disorders (CSD) is to train researchers and scholars to address the needs of children and adults with communication disorders. The program will prepare doctoral students for academic careers in research and university-level teaching in both speech-language pathology and speech and language science. Students will make significant contributions to the profession's research base.

The objectives of the doctoral degree in communication sciences and disorders are:

- To develop doctoral students to become researchers and scholars in the vast area of communication sciences and disorders
- To prepare doctoral students who are equipped to lead and collaborate across disciplines
- To prepare doctoral students who will pursue and obtain research faculty positions at research colleges and universities in CSD programs and related disciplines.

